OSAKA—More than 400 Kansai-area musicians will join their counterparts in 120 nations in "Fête de la Musique," an annual music festival held on and around the summer solstice on June 21.

Originating in Paris in 1981, the festival offers free live performances of many different kinds of music in various places in cities around the world.

For three days, beginning June 19, 24 places in Osaka—including the Hilton Osaka, Hyatt Regency Osaka, Osaka City Hall, all in Kita Ward, and the Wine Museum in Minato Ward—and Kyoto will become stages for both professional and amateur musicians who volunteered for the Japanese version of the festival.

Toshihiko Sugimoto, secretary general of the festival's Japan office, said he started the event in Osaka three years ago at the time of the soccer World Cup finals.

"Osaka lost its bid to host the 2008 Olympic Games and people have felt stifled by the long recession," Sugimoto said.

"Ever since I saw a photo of a little girl playing violin on a street corner in Paris during the festival, I have felt sympathetic to the festival's aim and have hoped to have a similar event in Osaka so that people can experience live music," Sugimoto said.

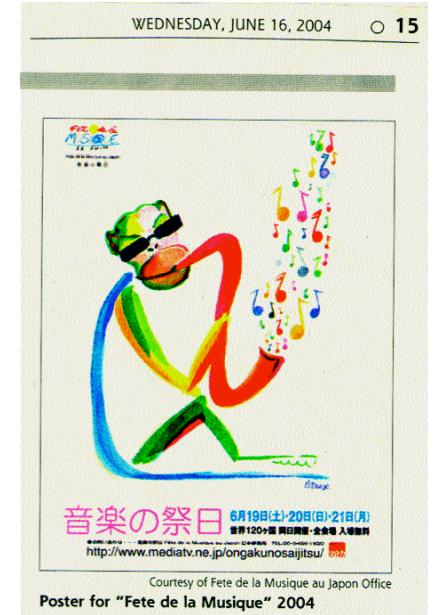

He visited Paris on the day of festival in 2001 and was inspired by the atmosphere created by being able to hear all kinds of music all over the city.

This year, he hopes to create a similar atmosphere in the 24 venues that were made available to the festival for free. The number of performing groups are about the same as last year, but some of them are new, having applied for this year's festival after seeing the information on the festival Web site.

Among the participants are Koteki no Kai, a group of female flutists; Roger Walch, a jazz pianist from Switzerland; Mei Yukie, a chanson singer; El Cielo, a folk group; and The Beatraps, a Beatles cover band.

The youngest performer is Kyoko Masunaga, a second-year middle school student, who will be featured in Louis Spohr's concerto for violin and orchestra No. 8 at Flanders Center in Tennoji Ward, Osaka.
